Need for revision surgery

People Who Filed Zimmer Lawsuits

People who file Zimmer hip replacement lawsuits claim that their injuries were caused by the device maker's negligence and could have been avoided. One complaint states the Durom Cup failure rate is as high as 30 percent and that Zimmer continued to market the defective product.

Matthew and Stephanie Cristino

Matthew Cristino received a Durom implant in 2006. Despite "ideal conditions for a hip replacement," he experienced "extreme pain and weakness" following his surgery. He had to receive multiple revision surgeries. He alleged that Zimmer was aware of a high rate of failure associated with the device, but failed to warn his surgeon. He and his wife sued Zimmer in federal court in California. Their case was later transferred to the federal MDL.

David and Lucinda Weaver

Lucinda Weaver received a total hip replacement in 2007. She later suffered loosening and separation of her Durom implant. She claimed that the implant was defective and "did not perform as safely as an ordinary consumer would expect." She filed a personal injury lawsuit in California state court for damages, including medical expenses and
